

Once upon a time, there were lambs and lions living in a place called Peace Springs. But before that, there was a fierce war between the lambs and the lions. This is where the proverb, "March comes in like a lion and out like a lamb" comes from.

It was the first of March. Several lambs were eating grass. Some stealthy lions suddenly came out of nowhere and attacked them. One lamb was eaten and the others ran behind the massive metal gate that they built. The lambs were sad because one of them had died.

The next day, the lambs made powerful weapons to destroy the lions. The battle had begun. The lions and the lambs suffered heavy damage. Both the lamb and lion leaders talked to each other. They signed a treaty. The lions were sitting on the grass and the lambs walked happily away.

The lambs fell for the lions' trick. The lions ripped the treaty and started attacking the lambs. The lambs suffered badly. From that day on, the lambs trusted no one.

Two weeks later, the lambs created ninjustus that would kill the lions once and for all. There were fire styles, sand styles, water styles and lighting styles. Every lamb in the lamb village could use the new techniques they learned. And so, they planned an invasion against the lions. At 12:00 midnight the lambs started to attack. All the lions had died. The lambs were tired. Some went to sleep, but they never woke up.

That is how the proverb "March comes in like a lion and out like a lamb" was made up. Even today, baby lions that grow up, eat lambs. The lambs' powers had vanished. The only thing they can do is run. However, when some lambs are mad, they dare to charge at the lions. The war between the lambs and lions will never be over.
